(half way between Seattle & Portland)

Authenticity."

Arnold Friberg has always felt a deep respect for Native American cultures both in the U.S. and in Canada. After all of his work with the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, Canada feels like his second home. It has been a great honor to him that Native Americans visiting his studio have often commented that his paintings have "strong medicine." He views "When the Land Was His" as a companion to his equestrian portrait of Prince Charles, "Each represents royalty in his own domain." Not an action picture, this is a tribute to the beauty and ingenuity of Indian craftsmanship, achieved with simple, available native materials.
